

Property market hesitates in election run-up

- House prices were almost static in the first quarter of 2013
- Only stand-alone houses saw some rise, up 1.2 per cent across the three months.
- Town houses recorded some falls in prices, by 1.5 per cent.
- Apartments also recorded a 0.2 per cent decline.
- Rents continued to surge as the quarter opened, but by March were also slowing
- Town house rents jumped the most sharply in Q1, up 3.8 per cent, to make for a 14.8 per cent rise on a year earlier
- Standalone rents also rose relatively strongly, by 2.1 per cent from December to March.
- But apartment rents were largely stagnant, up just 0.2 per cent in Q1

Hass Consult today revealed a slowdown in the housing market in the first quarter as purchasers held off in concluding house moves during the election, resulting in house prices as reflected in the Hass Composite property price index remain largely static.

The Hass composite, which indexes housing prices from all published and formal sector sources, recorded a 0.5 per cent increase in house prices, driven by some continuing movement in the prices for standalone houses, but offset by marginal declines in the asking prices for town houses and apartments.

The number of completions were relatively low in the first quarter, when compared with the quarterly activity of the last decade, but were significantly higher than in the first quarters of 2011 and 2012, revealing an underlying strengthening in the sales market.

In a buying cycle that typically gains momentum in the second and third quarters of the year, the volume of new business and viewings also rose sharply from January to March, suggesting an ongoing revival of activity following interest rate cuts and ahead of the election.

“The election, which represented perhaps the biggest concern for investors of any event in Kenya for the last five years, has created some pent up demand, as investors have held off awaiting the outcome,” said Ms Sakina Hassanali, Head of Research and Marketing at Hass Consult.

“However, with fears focused on a direct line impact on the Kenyan economy - which like the elections of 2007 had the potential to leave a long tail of suppressed growth - buyers began to position themselves for swift purchasing ahead of further price rises in the event, as happened, that the election passed peacefully,” said Ms Hassanali.

The rentals market also slowed down as the elections got into full swing, with asking prices for rentals rising by 1.9 per cent on the previous quarter, where they had surged 4.4 per cent on the three months earlier in both the third and fourth quarters of 2012.

“The rental market is yet set to see further price rises, despite limited disposable income among consumers, who currently pay a far higher proportion of their incomes in rent than is the norm globally.”

“The push is coming as expensive mortgages tie potential buyers into renting, amid some tightening of rental supplies, and with landlords seeking better returns after almost two years of relative losses,” said Ms Hassanali.
